Human Rights Commission Annual Report for 2020 and Priorities for 2021

The year 2020 has been one of the most difficult years in the nation’s history. In February the COVID-19 virus became a pandemic and rapidly spread throughout the country. By the second week in March, schools in WV were closing. WVU students left campus for spring break and were asked to quarantine themselves at home for the remainder of the spring semester. The economy began to suffer. Some persons were laid off. Some were forced to stop paying rents. Most commercial service businesses struggled. Some small businesses closed. Social distancing, face masks, and ventilation have become essential for any interpersonal interaction, and on-line classes have become a prominent means for maintaining education process at nearly all levels except for the very young.

In this environment, inconsistencies in adequate compensation for “essential workers” became more evident. Criminal justice tragedies such as the police-inflicted deaths of Breonna Taylor in Louisville and George Floyd in Minneapolis put people on the streets protesting unjust policing. Major week-long demonstrations occurred in 1,200 U.S. cities – including for four days in Morgantown during the last week in May. Demonstrations on one day involved over 1,000 persons and was recorded by a national video organization to demonstrate that even small cities were taking action. Overall, it seems that some people in their own insecurities with the pandemic were more able to be sensitive to the plight of others.

The Morgantown Human Rights Commission continued its monthly meetings via Zoom telecommunications from March through December but still was able to accomplish many of its priorities for the year. A revised Diversity, Equity and Inclusion Plan for the City was adopted by resolution in March, and Council planned to have an ordinance on plan provisions adopted in the fall. This has not yet happened, and the Commission will be following up on this important request in 2021. In spite of a year marked by three Commissioners moving from the area, the Commission has made several important steps forward and completed several accomplishments as noted below.

Specific accomplishments of the Commission during 2020 in relation to its set priorities for the year:
